Director's statement.

'Home' is a very personal film that evolved over the course of ten years and is really a composite of several shortfilm ideas in which the common denominator was a love for my native land. I have tried to combine awe of nature, fascination of the past, while hinting at an undefined feeling of anxiety towards an uncertain future that I think most parents share.

The goal in making this short documentary was to communicate to as many people as possible, and in a compelling way, the effects of global warming on the people living in Greenland and therefore the film's main platform has always been intended to be YouTube. The fact that the film has been admitted to film festivals and exhibitions around the world is just an added bonus (of which I am very grateful, humbled, and honoured).

Telling any story with Greenland as a backdrop is an easy task. The sheer natural beauty and the expansiveness of the vistas make for interesting visuals that are hard not to find engaging. But film is not solely a visual medium - the visuals should serve to tell a story - and ultimately it is up to you, the audience, to judge whether 'Home' succeeds in being a compelling shortfilm. I just hope the film itself speaks to you as much as it spoke to me while making it.
